I had visited this restaurant in the Ironbound a few days before I took this picture. The space is small, comprised mainly of a grill that lined the wall and the counter. I was surprised that of the five employees there not one had on a mask. Since the waiting area was only eight feet long social distancing was close to impossible as three more people came in. I promised myself I would never eat there again. A few days later I walked by and saw this note on the door. After posting, one of my Facebook friends posted, "I wonder what is behind that newspaper?"

This trip to Seabra's on Lafayette Street was the first one where the supermarket had implemented the social distancing rules. I waited in the car while my partner stood online intending to join her when she got closer to the door. While I waited I saw this photographer come to document the people on the line. Since I am an artist, historian and public humanities specialist I am always compelled to document other people's work. Whether he was a student or professional photographer it did not matter - just that the moment was significant enough to record.

This image was taken on a walk one early evening. I am always compelled by street art, graffiti or public art that conveys messages to the general public not just to other graffiti artists. I am always shocked and moved by artists that use the names of diseases. There is an artist that uses the tag "AIDS" and that always makes me feel a range of feelings from curiosity to sadness. In a way this Covid-19 one made me feel a similar range of feelings. Later on, looking at the image I noticed the droplets. I was quiet for a moment thinking of how again the things that are the most natural to our bodies such as spit and other bodily fluids now have to be perceived as an enemy, again.
